A Rationale for Empathy

A student's emotions coming into the class affect the way, and how much they learn. Educators must be able to connect to, and understand their students in order to best serve those students' needs "focused on nurturing learning rather than judging performance" (Hinton, 2008, p. 91).

"Expressing care for another is not an innate ability present more naturally in some people than others, but rather a skill that can be taught and nurtured through a supportive educational environment" (McLennan, 2008, p. 454).

A Rationale for Empathy

Students learn best when they have positive relationships with those around them. Developing positive relationships requires empathy skills like listening to others, understanding verbal and nonverbal cues, and learning to understand, and appreciate the differences in others. Students bring their lives into the classroom; they do not leave their problems and feelings at the door, and when classmates do not have the skills to understand and work with their diverse classmates problems can arise.

How do we develop empathy?

There are a number of ways:

- Learning to listen
- Tuning into non-verbal communication
- Being fully present to another
- Putting yourself 'in the shoes' of the other person
- Understanding the relationship between needs and emotions
- Learning to take on different perspectives
- Understanding the equality of self and other
